What can you write an article about

How to write articles fast is an art form I've spent some time perfecting. See, I don't really want to spend more than 20 minutes a day writing an article. And I spent no more than 20 minutes writing this article. I realize this is writing blasphemy. But when I have a daily schedule to post on and a business to run, I can't find more time to write. There simply isn't time to spend hours polishing every single blog post or writing 2,000-word articles. Writing quickly doesn't mean compromising on writing well, though. I've got 10 tips to get you in and out of that composition box fast – without sacrificing quality.

1. Keep an idea list When inspiration for a post strikes, scribble it down in a notebook or word file. For many bloggers and content creators, finding the topic to write about takes up half the time. Keeping an idea list to capture more creative content ideas lets you leap in to a new post quickly when you're ready to write.
2. Let your ideas incubate If you try to force yourself to come up with supporting information for your brilliant idea right away, it's going to take ages. Let that topic sit for a few days, though, and you can add new ideas as they occur to you. And when you're ready to write, you'll already have all the supporting info you need.
3. Edit before you start You've probably got twice as many ideas as you need at this point, so it's time to be brutal with your content editing. Cut out any supporting idea that doesn't fit with the main topic of the article. Remember, we're talking about how write articles fast, not an epic. You can always use the ideas you don't need for later posts.
4. Use bullet points When you learn how to write bullet points, it can make writing an article fast a lot simpler, in terms of organization. You no longer have to figure out transitions from one idea to the next. The great side benefit is that readers like lists. They're easier for the eye to follow.
5. Keep it short If you want to finish that article fast, try to keep it under 1,000 words. Don't feel like you're skimming on quality content, either. This article isn't more than 1,000 words but it's chock-full of information. Make every word count and you'll save time without letting quality slip.
6. Stay distraction-free It's easier to learn how to write a short article when you can dedicate time to focus on the task. If you can stop distractions and commit to 45 minutes of solid writing time, you'll be surprised by how much you can get done. Turn off notifications on your phone, or put it in another room. Only use your web browser for research related to your article.
7. Write in pre-defined time intervals See how I mentioned committing to 45 minutes in the tip above? It could be 30 minutes or 90 minutes as well. The point is to set a certain period of time specifically for writing. You can even set a timer to keep you on track. When the time is up, you can do other work.
8. Don't overthink it Once you've carved out your distraction-free space, you want to start writing as quickly as possible. Second-guessing your idea is just going to eat away at the time you've set aside to write. You can explore other content ideas later. Use this time to complete your assignment.
9. Come back later When you don't feel like writing, don't try to force the words to come. Save the article and work on something else for a while until you're no longer stuck. If inspiration strikes, open up that document again. You can even switch from one blog post to another, spending a few minutes on each as ideas come to you. It's a huge time-saver.
10. Never save a good idea It's tempting, when you look through your list of content ideas, to save the best ones for later because you think they'll be easier to write. You don't want to save time later, you want to save time now. Do the articles you know will come easily and make the most of that time. Follow these simple steps and you'll be on your way to writing articles fast. Thank you to guest blogger Michelle Shaeffer. Since I started blogging nearly 4 years ago, I've discovered the joy—and frustration—of deciding what to write about. Sometimes an idea spontaneously comes to mind and I'm compelled to sit down right there and then and hammer out a post and hit publish. At other times, a topic I've been chewing on and researching finally crystallizes in my mind and flows naturally and quickly through my fingertips. And then there are the moments when I hit a wall. Try as I might, I can't come up with a distinctive angle for my post, or decide what I want to say that will add something new to the conversation on the topic. I call this "blogger's block." Every blogger faces this problem at one time or another. Some folks believe the best remedy for this is to just sit down and write, publish—and then do it again (and again). But what if there were a shortcut? A quick "cheat sheet" to get you started? Here are 16 topic ideas that might give you some quick inspiration and practical ideas when you find yourself up against "the wall": All of us have an inexhaustible well of unique experiences from our personal and professional lives that we can draw upon for our posts. Set the scene, tell what happened, then share what you learned from your experience. No need to conduct exhaustive research on Google. Just write what you know, share what you've learned, and give readers a peek into how you see the world. You know something can be done differently or better, and you know how to do it, so why not share that? Some of my most popular articles have been the ones where I was passionate—even angry, sometimes—about an issue that I felt needed to be addressed. If you feel strongly about something, it's very likely others will too. This format offers an inexhaustible supply of potential ideas. If you know how to do something—even if it's slightly better or different than how others do it—then you can probably write about it. Take something you do well, break it down into steps, and then illustrate and support each step in the process with facts and examples. You're probably an expert at certain things, but haven't shared what you know with a wider audience. Write a list with tips on how to do something better, drawing on the years of experience you've acquired and the understanding of the topic that only you possess. People like to read and share content about topics that are in the news and that could have an impact on their professional and personal lives. Weigh-in with your take on a trending topic or breaking news item. Ever read a blog post and realized that you knew more than the writer about the topic, or believed you could do a better job at writing about it? Find ideas from content that has already been published and put your unique spin on it. As long as you add your own perspective and analysis to the topic—and you don't simply copy what the original post said—then the topic is fair game. This is another type of post format that offers a virtually inexhaustible supply of potential topics to write about. If you've done something that has generated tangible results in an area that people are struggling with or trying to do better at, then it's likely they'll want to know about it. There's only so much you can draw on from your own experience that you can write about. And that's okay, because you have other people's experience to draw upon! There are so many fascinating and useful stories of success that you can draw from for your posts. Just remember to give credit where it's due. Sometimes a handful of quotes from an inspiring leader or artist, or surprising facts about their lives, can make for an interesting and quick read. The key is to tie the quotes or facts together around a central message or theme that you want to convey with your post. I'm surprised by how little cross-pollination there is between the worlds of podcasting and blogging. Why aren't more writers diving into the amazing content that is being produced in the podcasting world each and every day, and using that content for their blog posts? Podcasts offer a motherlode of topic ideas and meaty content you can use for your blog posts. By pegging your post to a major holiday or recurring event like Mother's Day or the annual college graduation season, your post will become more timely and relevant. There are so many interesting stories that are waiting to be told. Just invite someone for an interview, prepare some questions around a theme, and hit record. Write up the lessons you learned and insights you gleaned from the conversation. Read the tea leaves once in a while and call out a trend you know is brewing. Just be sure you've got some facts to back up your forecasts. You write lots of emails each day without considering it "writing". But what if your email were your blog post? Think about a piece of advice you want to share with someone, write it as an email to that person (without using real names, of course), and hit publish. It will flow easily, and it will sound like your authentic voice—because it is. You're not a writer of fiction—or so you think. Try this experiment: Write a short dialogue between yourself and an imaginary person that you would like to talk to about a topic that you feel passionate about. Dialogue can be surprisingly easy to write, and like the fictional email technique, it will sound authentic. Reflect on how someone—whether you actually knew him or not—had a profound impact on your career, or some aspect of your life. These can be brief but powerful pieces that require little more than tapping into your memory and personal impressions. This list is of course by no means exhaustive. But I hope it gives you some ideas the next time you run out of topics to write about. Ultimately, the best cure for "blogger's block" is to simply choose a topic, write a post, and hit publish. And then do it all over again. A version of this article appeared on LinkedIn.
